

What Would Disclosure Really Mean?

Adam Tugwell | 21 January 2015

If Extraterrestrial or Non-Human Intelligent life were proven to exist, should we fear them or our own leaders more?

With everything and perhaps everyone we see and hear about online appearing to be or on their way to becoming completely mad, the question of who or what lies behind the months of 'drone', UAP (Unidentified Anomalous Phenomena) or UFO (Unidentified Flying Object) sightings in the USA and over air bases in the UK hasn't caused anything like the alarm that we might have expected it to, even 10 years ago.

Whilst there is much to suggest that Congressional Hearings in the USA indicate that the establishment is working towards introducing some new truth into the public realm, the question over the existence of Extraterrestrials or Non-Human Intelligence (NHI) forms visiting or even being present on the earth would no doubt raise many questions for the world's population. Even amongst those from within different communities who believe that they have already accepted and are comfortable with the idea that either civilizations from outside of the world or entities that cannot normally be seen, exist.

Given the behaviour of the political classes and the world elites of late, the idea that the presence of aliens from other parts of the Universe or beings visiting Earth who have crossed dimensions and possibly even time could have been covered up and kept secret from the masses, certainly isn't a story that many of us will find difficult to believe.

However, the question of why and for how long is a different matter.

Now, before you think that we are about to go down some conspiracy-driven rabbit hole to discuss the different 'known' types of extraterrestrials and spiritual beings who may be brushing past us in some shape-shifted form on the high street, there is plenty to read about on the internet or watch on platforms such as YouTube. If this is a minefield you want to walk across carrying an open mind.

The more important questions to focus on, is 'Why would the presence of any intelligent non-human life forms be problematic for those who govern and have governed us?' and 'Why does this question remain highly relevant if disclosure of some kind is on its way?'

'Disclosure' would take power over 'the narrative' out of Leaders hands

Fundamentally, it all comes down to control. Or control of us, to be precise.

Those who are supposedly in control have always understood the value of information.

They know and thrive by the rule that what the general population believe and that the careful use of fear of just about anything can be used to influence the way that the majority of people behave.

However, when we talk about those in control, we should look above the politicians and the establishment beyond them, and also consider the historical role that religion and the interpreted or guided role of God, Source, some 'higher force', or whatever we may wish to call any form of unseen and all powerful deity that is important within our lives.

Our relationship with faith and religion is where all of us should be able to observe the most obvious example of how life plays out for us all, depending upon what believe, in whom we believe, and why we believe it.

Religion or more accurately religious dogma, rather than accurate truth or well-intended metaphor, are perhaps the cleverest and most dangerous tool that man has ever created for use against his fellow man. Because its main purpose has always been a tool of social control, with the pathway of faith within really being left to little more than the gift of chance.

Religion uses belief – and more importantly fear of the unknown, the unseen and the all powerful – and a hierarchy between us and any deity - that suggests there are special people who have a relationship with them that we don't – to create, maintain and police rules that carry eternal punishments as well as in some cases, a premature physical death.

It's that element of doubt, fueled by the restriction of information and learning that is enough to quiet even the most inquisitive of minds. Whilst knowledge of 'the game' empowers all of those who are 'in the know' about what religious dogma is intended for, and what the metaphors and stories that it contains really mean.

Religion was at its most powerful when there was very little choice or option for the masses. When the world in today's terms appeared to be extremely small.

However, learning could no longer be contained as the enlightenment and industrialisation pushed through changes that led to it being normal for all classes within society to be given the opportunity to learn.

The power that had been held so tightly within the grasp of men of the cloth and the monarchs and lords who were bought into the way things were done, gave way to the printing press, to media and to westernized money-centric governments and other unscrupulous leaders who used other forms of fear and the threat of material loss in very effective ways to control us all too.

As the world has itself become smaller, the great countries and the empires that once existed have increasingly fallen behind the movements and organisations that run themselves today as a world government in waiting. All under the pretence that becoming the one, ideally alone, or one of the few, who rule the world is just about as good as it gets. No matter whether such systems of governance are genuinely good for all mankind and certainly without any regard to the real cost.

After all, if you are in charge of everything; there is nothing else and the buck stops with you, what you say really goes. Doesn't it?

If the world is all there is in terms of intelligent life in the Universe, it would arguably be the case that this statement is certainly true.

But just like the questions that anyone who can think for themselves will surely have about the presence and meaning of God, or whatever we would like to call that all powerful being or energy; and whether those who place themselves in the role of middle man between us and whatever God is, have any genuine or 'God given right' to hold that responsibility, what is there really to tell us that Extraterrestrial beings or non-human intelligence doesn't exist and that it could already have been on earth for at least 80 years already. Just because it or they are something that the masses haven't yet seen?

Who do our leaders lead for?

It stands to reason that our leaders would know quickly, if the presence or visits of such entities as Extraterrestrials, forms of Non-Human Intelligence or openly active Spiritual Beings were to genuinely exist.

The question that therefore naturally follows is 'Would it make more sense for world leaders to cover up the presence of Extraterrestrials or Non-Human Intelligence, or just come clean and let everyone know that they do exist?'

Such a question is only likely to be relevant, if such entities were generally peaceful and looking to help; to perhaps benefit mankind in some way, or find some other way to coexist.

If not, and if they were already here, there is as good a chance as any that the world would have already have experienced something akin to HG Wells War of the Worlds. Or something rather like one of the modern Alien Invasion Films like Independence Day.

However, if our leaders were not using any gifts that were shared to help mankind, as the intent may otherwise have been, it is also arguably likely that whoever or whatever is visiting us would eventually become impatient with the worlds leadership. Especially as those visitors become more and more aware of what having the type of leadership we currently have on the planet really means for us and the planet itself.

The realities of 'Disclosure' for our leaders and then for us?

So, let's say that the presence of the drones and the questions that surround them are heralding an oncoming form of disclosure, where the truth will be revealed to the world, and that we are indeed not in any way alone.

In one moment, we will all become aware that in terms of a very big Universe, the world and its human population has suddenly become very small indeed.

That in itself will raise questions for us that we will return to shortly.

But for our leaders, who have relished their dominion over the world and intelligent life, such an 'outing' would also revise their place and seriously diminish their perceived or ego-driven value in the Universe.

We can of course live in hope that our leaders would or would have had the good grace and be big enough to just accept this new reality and what it would really mean.

Sadly, we are not blessed with good leaders in the sense of them being good for anyone other than themselves.

Big egos, mixed with the perception of great power and the idea that their position makes them inherently right is a dangerous mix.

Holding on to and protecting the power that they have become so jealous of will almost inevitably be their priority. If the arrival and presence of Extraterrestrials or Non-Human Intelligence should be disclosed outside of the realms and conditions of their control.

And they are likely to do anything and everything they can to maintain that power. No matter what and who they destroy.

Can we take away the uncertainty of a post-Disclosure Future?

We need not share the ins and outs of what that pathway would look like.

But for us, it is very unlikely that the result of their actions would result in anything good for the rest of humanity.

It is almost certain that we would experience tragic levels of loss, rather than anything that we would recognise as being akin to a win. Even though we can be certain that the establishment narratives would tell us that was exactly what we were experiencing and that the cost was both unavoidable and necessary.

However, the truth that we would face, if the presence of a non-confrontational, non-controlling, non-warring presence were to be confirmed, is that the Universe and potentially the races and cultures of intelligent life that exist out there could be infinite in number.

The new place that we would then inhabit within the Universe would bring with it the requirement of another truth we will have to face: That we can no longer continue to live in the way that we have been, by abusing each other and the planet that we inhabit, as if it doesn't matter. Because what is there is there for us to fight for control over, as it's all that there is.

If the technology that some suspect is now being introduced to us over UK airbases and American skies does demonstrate just a little of what does already exist, it will defy the logic of any one of us who is materially obsessed that we either know all there is to know, or that we have the ability to conquer those who might already be visiting us. Let alone any others who have been sensible enough to stay away from such a selfish and troublesome place.

There can be little doubt that those of us who place material possessions, wealth and power above all things have lost sight of what real values and respect for life, humanity and the environment which we share and in which we live really mean.

It is the choice we have to recognise and to embrace this, where our post-Disclosure future would really lie. Irrespective of whether we can only accept that those who share the Universe with us are also physical in nature; whether they are spiritual or even thought-based in nature, or indeed they are something that we can make sense of that falls in between.

Inevitable change for us all lies ahead

One way or another, this planet and its occupants are on the pathway to inescapable change. Because we are either putting money, power and influence before other people, or we are playing a role at some level that is allowing others to do so.

None of us will know whether that change will be triggered by some plan for a New World Order, a pandemic, a financial crash, a third world war or the arrival of an Extraterrestrial or Non-Human Intelligent race that quickly makes our ridiculous leaders and all of us realise just how powerless they and we really are, when it comes to the way we have been living and what we have prioritised in life.

However, whenever and whatever that change is and what ever it will be, there is nothing more certain that that with that change will come a choice.

That choice will either be to stick with what we know and believe that the system we are living within serves our best interests through its obsession with material living.

Or, we can choose to leave the obsession with money, power, influence and top-down hierarchies behind us and embrace a very different way of life that puts values, the love of our fellow man, our communities and the environment that we exist in partnership with. Right at the centre of a world that doesn't recognise any difference between what the world tells us today is very small, and the true value of anyone living being, being as big as big could ever be considered to be.

The most interesting thing about the Universe, everything that may or may not exist and the place that we all have within it, is it is something that we can learn about and enjoy the pathway of discovery it offers us all, just as soon as we recognise that we have always had that choice – and that it is a very real and valuable choice too.
